

"I was personally appalled," Ms. Schmoyer said. "The trial made a mockery of state law and someone's personal religious beliefs. I now understand how the Salem witchcraft trials were possible."

Prosecutors Mary McKeown and Larry Hart objected dozens of times during the trial, claiming that testimony in the case was being allowed to go beyond Blackwood's pretrial inclination to limit testimony to the church's beliefs and philosophy and not its rituals and practices. They invoked a 1944 U.S. Supreme Court case dealing with an offbeat religious movement called the "I Am," whose leaders had been charged with mail fraud.

In an opinion written by Justice William O. Douglas, the court reversed the convictions of the "I Am" leader because the truth of their beliefs had been subjected to trial.

"Heresay trials are foreign to our Constitution," Douglas wrote. "Men may believe what they cannot prove. They may not be put to the proof of their religious doctrines or beliefs."

Judge Speaks

The big difference with this trial, Judge Blackwood said this week, is that Tenney and Cornell — not the church — were criminal defendants.

"The defendants had a right to present a defense that Scientology was a money-making scheme or something other than a religion," Blackwood said.

"The problem with leaving that up to the judge," Blackwood reasoned, "in that this was not a civil case — it was a criminal case. There were disputed facts, and only a jury can decide those facts. I could not resolve those factual discrepancies. The jury had to do that."

Blackwood conceded that the "real issue" in the case "boiled down to whether or not Scientology was a religion." But he said the jury's innocent verdict was "not absolute or unequivocal" proof that Scientology is not a religion. It merely shows that the jury had "a reasonable doubt" as to Scientology's religious status, he said.

Nevertheless, the trial itself left some with an uneasy feeling. Not only was the Church of Scientology, as a corporate body, condemned as "a vicious criminal cult," but its fundamental beliefs, rituals and artifacts — as practiced by thousands of apparently sincere followers — were publicly ridiculed.

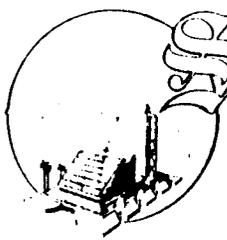

How many other religions could survive such critical scrutiny?

Unease with Decision

Would the jury have come to the same conclusion for the Christians of colonial Williamsburg, who by law pilloried persons for missing church four Sundays in a row? Would the jury have exonerated the 17th-century Puritans of Massachusetts Bay Colony, who by law stripped Quakers to the waist and bounced them from the colony? Do the actions of Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini mean that Islam is no longer a valid religion?

The millions of Moslems who were revolted by Khomeini's actions would surely disagree. So does prosecutor Mary McKeown.

"I'm not asking you to believe that (Scientology founder) L. Ron Hubbard is a saint," Miss McKeown told the jurors last week. "He obviously is not. He is a mortal man with many grave faults... But to the thousands and millions who believe in Scientology — to those people — Scientology is not a sham."

WHAT IS A RELIGION?

Did Scientology Get a Fair Trial?

by Craig Robertson

The following story first appeared in the Jan. 18 CLEARWATER (Florida) TIMES edition of the ST. PETERSBURG TIMES, to whom we are grateful for permission to reprint it here.

For five days last week, the Church of Scientology was in the dock, its beliefs, rituals, artifacts and policies — and even the personality of its elusive founder — were dissected and denounced.

The trial was somewhat of a spectacle. Reporters from nearly a dozen newspapers and electronic media were present. A television camera recorded the proceedings. A near-roomful of spectators — some of them more offended by Scientology's "Godless" beliefs than its alleged crimes — showed up each day.

A jury of five women and one man was chosen. The main issue facing them was whether or not Scientology is a bona fide religion. In less than an hour, the jurors decided it is not.

Technically, the defendants in the case were Richard Tenney, a Clearwater mayoral candidate, and Alex Cornell, a candidate for City Commission. They had deliberately invited arrest, under an obscure state law designed to prevent religious defamation.

In their arrests, Tenney and Cornell saw a chance to "prove" that Scientology is not a religion, thus making the Church of Scientology the true defendant — not Richard Tenney or Alex Cornell.

But did Scientology receive a fair trial? Were its rights under the Constitution protected?

Certain obvious questions come to mind immediately. For example, could the church, the target of extensive publicity in recent years, reasonably expect to get an unbiased jury in Pinellas County?

And could the church reasonably expect the office of Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney James T. Russell, which is conducting a criminal investigation of the church, to earnestly defend the church's interests in the Tenney-Cornell trial?

But beyond those questions, there is another question about the trial of the Church of Scientology that would seem to be of interest to all religious groups. Could it happen to them?

State Law

Perhaps it is well to begin with a look at Florida Statute 836.11. It is this law, passed by the Florida Legislature in 1945, that was invoked in the prosecution of Tenney and Cornell.

The law makes it a crime for anyone to "print, publish, distribute or cause to be printed, published or distributed by any means, in any manner whatsoever" any "printed material which tends to expose any individual or religious group to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy" unless the name and address of the source of the material is printed on it.

Tenney and Cornell were charged with distributing blue-and-white bumper stickers bearing the words "Stamp Out Scientology." The stickers did not contain a printed disclaimer.

Introduced in the Florida House of Representatives by the late Rep. George Okell, D-Miami, the bill was an apparent effort to counter religious bigotry. Okell probably never dreamed his law would one day be used to attack an organization many say is only claiming to be a religion.

Unfortunately, Okell's law fails to define what was meant by "religious group." The omission turned out to be a major headache for the jury in the trial. Three local ministers, called to the stand by Tenney and Cornell, gave three different definitions of religion. A university professor gave a fourth definition.

Judge Defines "Religion"

Ultimately, the jurors were told to apply a fifth definition provided by presiding Judge William B. Blackwood Jr. Taken from case law and discussions with the attorneys, Blackwood defined a religious group as:

"An identifiable group of people who are associated together into an organization, which organization exists for the purpose of adhering to or obeying a set or system of moral beliefs about God or a supernatural force or to a set or system of beliefs that function as a religion in their lives and that occupy a place in their lives parallel to that filled by God in traditional religion.

"However," the definition continues, "a group which follows principles or tenets that are merely political, sociological or philosophical or that amount to a merely personal moral code is not a religious group."

"In deciding this case," Blackwood told the jurors, "you are not to consider whether any sincerely held beliefs are correct or incorrect."

In the midst of their deliberations, the jurors returned to the courtroom and asked Blackwood to read the definition again. Jury foreman Irvin R. Slonaker later said the group reached their decision after applying Blackwood's definition to Scientology.

Legal Opinion

Some court observers said Blackwood should have ruled on the religion question himself, before jury selection. Failing that, some felt that the judge went too far in allowing titillating testimony about such church practices as "bullbaiting," and the even stranger personality quirks of church founder L. Ron Hubbard.

Marjorie Schmoyer, a Sarasota lawyer hired by the church to observe and critique the trial, said the question of Scientology's religious status is a matter of law and should have been decided by Blackwood, not the jury. Had he done so, there would have been no testimony about Scientology's religious beliefs.

Ms. Schmoyer also criticized Blackwood for failing to limit testimony to the church's beliefs. By allowing testimony on the strange-sounding rituals and practices of Scientology, she said, Blackwood set the stage for what church spokesmen later called "a three-ring circus."

F.A.I.R. Report on Cult Activities

The following was received in February from F.A.I.R., the British cult education group located at BCM, Box 3535, P.O. Box 12, London WC1N 3XX.

Cult Activities

Many think that the Moonies have disappeared altogether, but this is unfortunately not the case. They have more money than ever even if they don't recruit many converts. French people are recruited abroad — Britain, Germany, the USA — and foreigners are recruited here in France. But not very many, and some get out after a time. They are still selling their newspaper, "New Hope" on the streets, Ginseng and Jewellery ("Christian Bernard," "New World Diffusion"). One girl is trying to sell the movie "Inchon" (a commercial film about the Korean War said to be financed by Unification Church-related enterprises — ed.) A group of French Moonies was flown to New York to be engaged Jan. 1. They expect to be married by Moon (Sun Myung Moon, the church's founder — ed.). They do not know whether the ceremony will take place in New York or Korea. Some have asked their parents to give them money for the wedding. One girl asked for about $3,000.

On the whole, Moonies try to go underground in the "Home Churches." This is why people think they have disappeared. The Children of God are still begging, but they have no official association. Hare Krishna are quite visible, although they normally beg in plain clothes. At least fifty percent of them are foreigners. They have got permission to open a school at their farm, so members from Germany are coming to France with their children because they were not allowed to open a school in Germany.

Scientology and TM are still busy making money. But the most interesting development is the sprouting of small, cult-related businesses. Gurus ordain themselves Messiahs, gain a dozen converts or a few more, and make a comfortable living.

COMMENTARY FROM CANADA

Take Cults Seriously

by Mike Kropveld

This commentary first appeared in the Hyde Park forum of the Feb. 9 MCGILL (University, Montreal) DAILY. Mike Kropveld is a Program Specialist with the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation of Montreal which serves Jewish College Students in Montreal.

Over two years have passed since the events at Jonestown exploded into our lives. For days on end our TV screens and newspapers were filled with the frightening images of hundreds of children and adults all neatly laid out after their death ritual. For those who never knew what a cult was, this was a learning experience that one would never forget. Or was it?

For those who tried beforehand to warn others of the impending danger their sole consoling point was that maybe now society would take notice. Maybe now people would try to comprehend the workings of groups such as the People's Temple. Maybe now people would want to understand how and why people could become part of such movements, and ultimately, in the case of the followers of Jim Jones, take their own lives.

But that is not what has happened. The observers who before decried the impossibility of such a tragedy now state that it couldn't happen again.

People's Temple died two years ago in the jungles of Guayana, but the many other groups which existed then still continue to proliferate today.

False Impressions

Coverage by the media on the cult phenomenon has generally leaned towards reporting the sensational, the bizarre and the tragic. Although these events do occur the exclusive reporting of such events lends credence to the false belief that only a certain, somewhat bizarre segment of society gets involved in cults. And that the majority, the normal people, are exempt from the cult influence. The unlucky "bizarre" ones included the drop-outs, the druggies, and those with psychological problems. This rationale makes a neat clean package. We can then continue to insulate ourselves from the reality of it touching us. But reality shows a different story. In two separate studies of ex-members done by Dr. John Clark of Boston and Dr. Margaret Singer of Berkeley, it was found that 40% and 75% respectively of people tested on the psychological history were normal, maturing persons.

Another false impression held is that most members have sought out such groups. However, in the major cult groups (which in my opinion include the Unification Church

"Moonies," the Church of Scientology, Hare Krishna, and the Family of Love formerly called the Children of God) members have been very actively and systematically recruited. Very few actually sought out these movements, but encountered proselytizers while vacationing, on college campuses, at student hang-outs, or while camping on the street. The cult recruiter will generally strike up a conversation with a potential recruit. The planned encounter comes across usually as one of seeming sincerity, friendship, and interest in the individual. The Unification Church has significantly called their approach to winning over new members "love-bombing." The hold they seek to establish is not an intellectual one, intellect, which most would consider a protection, which little part in the encounter. The intellect can only function when the right information is given, and what is most often employed is out and out lying. Deception is practiced by not revealing the nature of the group, what involvement will entail, and in some cases, the real name of the group. Individuals who are more vulnerable to the appeal of these groups are people who are in a period of transition (between jobs, end of a relationship, pressure at school or at home, etc.) or lonely. At this point the warmth and sincerity of the recruiter becomes a very strong attraction. By establishing an emotional connection the recruiter will usually invite the individual to dinner, a course, or lecture, all designed to appeal to the emotional and idealistic values and needs of that person. The Unification Church provides a good example of the rationale behind the use of deception. Within this group they have coined a phrase, interestingly enough, called "Heavenly Deception." It's a catch-all phrase which rationalizes lying, cheating and stealing. In their battle for winning over new people to save the world, any manner in which a new member can be brought in is legitimized. Outsiders to the group are seen as part of the evil world. Therefore the best thing members are taught they can do is to bring new people to the right path, by any means, including lying.

Conversion Process

The new recruit is continually showered with attention, is bombarded with activities and lectures, and purposely rarely left alone for even a minute. This isolation in a strange environment makes outside reality testing difficult (contact with friends, family, TV, newspapers, etc.). This eventually leads the individual towards an emotional crisis situation. In this environment the group works on breaking down the individual's defense mechanisms, through focusing in on that person's vulnerabilities. Since the only reality testing available is that of the group, the new inductee begins to question himself, his beliefs, and life in general. When the confusion reaches its peak and the individual is floundering, the group steps in. Having created the situation which brings on this collapse, it now presents the means to cure it, and that is the way of the group. At this stage the real indoctrination into the particulars of the cult begins. Once critical thought and questioning abilities are at a low, the new recruit readily begins to accept the direction offered. Viewing it as the only lifeline out of emotional confusion.

Depending on the individual the inducement of such a breakdown can be effected within a matter of hours, but generally within a few days.

Most people would consider themselves probably immune to this sort of experience, but within the intense environment of a group, with the goal being your emotional destruction, and done subtly, I think few could resist. Submission to the group can also become an easy way out.

It is one thing to walk into such a situation with a knowledge of what is to take place. It is quite another thing to be deceived into it.

To believe that this can only happen to the young is to forget what can be learned from People's Temple, and that people of all ages were represented there.

Social Dangers

These cult groups are structured as totalitarian systems. Total faith and obedience is put into the hands of the leader, who in most cases is considered to be all-wise and divine. Within these tightly run organizations members follow unquestioningly the whims and dictates of their leader. In such organizations, and in any totalitarian group, the potential for danger to society and the members themselves does exist.

I feel as well that an equal danger if we view these groups without confronting the real problems they represent. For these movements have grown to meet needs which society is not fulfilling.

What to Do?

Education of itself is important. The public and especially students should be made aware of the presence of such movements. Deceptive recruitment, deceptive fundraising, well known techniques of psychological coercion, and the awareness of our own susceptibility to such subtle coercion must be more widely publicized. But that in itself is not enough, for even with education, if people find no viable alternatives within our society to fulfill their needs, education will be but another attempt at a bandaid cure on an already festering sore.

I believe there are no simple answers to the problems we face in society. I will leave simple solutions to the cults. But unless we do confront the institutions in society and confront ourselves, the real malaise which exists today will continue, and the future in itself will not offer miracles.

As Montrealers we should not feel immune to the cult phenomenon, as the major cult groups have existed here and in the rest of Canada for a number of years. The problems faced are not isolated or particular to any one region, but are international in scope.

Hanging over the throne of Jim Jones at Jonestown was a sign reading "Those who do not remember the past are condemned to repeat it." I would just add, "Those who do not remember the past," and understand it, "are condemned to repeat it."

Psychiatrist Says Churches Should Challenge Cults

By Richard Gill

Dispatch Religion Writer

Protestant and Catholic churches are partly responsible for the increase in cults across the country, a Harvard psychiatrist said.

John G. Clark, an assistant clinical professor of psychiatry at the Harvard Medical School who opposes cults, said churches have melted into the background, allowing cults to increase in strength and authority.

CULTS HE considers dangerous include the Church of Scientology, the Unification Church and The Way International. Clark said the Way's membership has increased to more than 100,000 followers, and members are actively recruiting high school youths.

"(The churches) should be right out in front of a movement to battle cults," said Clark, who was in Columbus earlier this week to take part in Grant Hospital's Distinguished Lecture series. "Churches should let them (cults) know that 'we're watching you. And we are going to make public everything you do.'"

"But (churches) have failed," he said. "They don't want to understand cults. They are scared of them."

Often, cult members come in right under the noses of church leaders, and steal their youths, said Clark.

Gill

The tolerance of mainline churches toward the beliefs of others are one reason cults have been able to lure away their members, Clark said. The churches respect other people's beliefs, he said. Cults do not. "They are non-tolerant. Absolute. And they are not really interested in the individual's life," Clark said.

That is what makes them dangerous, Clark said. "They assume that they have the absolute truth and nobody else has. They will do anything to accomplish their will."

Clark claims that the "group thinking" manifested in cults poses a serious threat to society. The same type of phenomenon occurred during the Nazi takeover of Germany.

CULTS HAVE sharpened their persuasive powers to a high degree of efficiency, Clark said.

"The conversion is the classic person," Clark said. "They change a person's mind altogether. They take a normal person, catch his attention and keep it under control long enough and in such a way that they bring about a trance state. In that transcendental stage they effect change.

"Our minds are put together after we are born. The mind is not the result of heredity. It has to change, to adapt. Cults use the mechanism of adaptation in extreme forms to create a multi-personality.

"They (cults) can change the furniture of the mind completely. And then provide the new furniture."

Cults, Clark said, tend to emphasize the "truth" in the life to come, or dwell on truths of the past. "They take no responsibility and show no charity to the living," he said.

BUT HOW and why do they do this?

"If a cult leader affects one follower and then another, and they both are licking his boots, he doesn't think about the psychology of what he's doing," Clark said.

"What he sees is power, the power to change. And that's the rawest form of power," he said.

Many persons become cult members without ever realizing it, Clark claims. "They get you in all the ways...before you know what has happened," he said.

Clark said there are about three million members of cults across the country today. Most cults, he said, tend to be short-lived, dying out within 10 years.

"Members cannot be hidden or sheltered forever from what is happening in society. When they learn, they drop out."

Clark said the whole issue of religion is built around tolerance and is sustained by a series of checks and balances. None of those things is considered in a cult.

Therefore, he suggested that churches will need to become less tolerant and lead the fight against cultism.

Bizarre Brainwashing Cult Cons Top Stars Into Backing Its Drug Program

Some of Hollywood's biggest stars have been duped into endorsing a controversial drug rehabilitation program called Narconon, which is actually operated by the bizarre brainwashing cult, the Church of Scientology.

More than 170 celebrities' names have been used as "Friends of Narconon." Although a few are Scientologists — such as Cathy Lee Crosby, Priscilla Presley and Karen Black — others were shocked to learn Narconon was an offshoot of the weird cult.

Many of the stars were listed as Friends of Narconon after they agreed to attend or participate in athletic events where the proceeds went to Narconon, which runs 15 treatment centers in the U.S. and 30 worldwide. Other celebrities on the list have no idea how their names got there.

Among the celebrities who were named as Friends of Narconon in a list submitted by Cathy Lee Crosby to a Congressional committee investigating drug abuse were:

Catherine Bach of "Dukes of Hazzard," John Davidson, Phyllis Diller, Gregory Harrison of "Trapper John, M.D.," Hal "Barney Miller" Linden, former heavyweight champ Ken Norton, Susan Richardson of "Eight Is Enough," Elvis Presley's former girlfriend Linda Thompson, writer-actor Mickey Spillane, Tanya Tucker, Fran Tarkenton, Charlene Tilton of "Dallas," Herve "Tattoo" Villechaize, Ralph Walte of "The Waltons," Henry "The Fonz" Winkler, Greg Evi-gan of "BJ and the Bear," Ron Howard, former star of

BLONDE Charlene Tilton of "Dallas" was on the list of stars.

"Happy Days," Lou "The Incredible Hulk" Ferrigno and Rob Reiner, who played the role of Archie Bunker's son-in-law on "All in the Family."

"It's true that Narconon's connection to Scientology is not specifically pointed out to every celebrity," admitted Mario Davis, a Scientologist who is executive vice president of Friends of Narconon in Beverly Hills.

However, he added, the celebrities were given pamphlets stating Narconon's drug rehabilitation program is based on the teachings of L. Ron Hubbard.

Hubbard is the founder of Scientology, although he is not identified that way in the pamphlets.

"It's disgraceful trickery because most people, including celebrities, would have nothing to do with Narconon if they knew of the Scientology connection," declared a former member of Scientology's top secret militant group called the Guardian's Office.

Recently, top leaders of the Scientology cult, including the wife of founder Hubbard, were convicted on federal charges in a massive conspiracy to infiltrate and burglarize government agencies, and thwart investigations of the controversial cult.

Spokesmen for several celebrities named as friends of Narconon expressed shock and dismay when they first learned that Narconon is a front for Scientology.

A spokesman for Henry Winkler said he "did not know that the Church of Scientology was involved . . . absolutely not!"

"Had we known, we would not have given permission for his name to be used."

A spokesman for Hal Linden said Linden "had no idea whatsoever" that Scientology was behind the drug program.

Phyllis Diller's spokesman said she wasn't even aware her name had been used as a Friend of Narconon.

"She wants her name removed from it," the spokesman said. "She doesn't want any part of it."

Similarly, spokesmen for Rob Reiner and Lou Ferrigno said those stars do not want their names to be associated with Scientology.

Narconon uses the same secret brainwashing techniques used by Scientologists to recruit new members into the cult, according to the former Scientologist, who was a member for five years.

treatment, the informant revealed. There are four stages of treatment at Narconon centers — starting at $630 and reaching at least $3,500.

"How many druggies can pay those kinds of prices?" the ex-Scientologist asked.

Dr. Forest S. Tennant Jr., a physician, public health specialist and a professor at UCLA, told The ENQUIRER he was hired by the state of California to investigate Narconon.

His probe concluded the program not only made "unsubstantiated" claims about its cure rate, it was also "very dangerous."

GERMANY Scientology Sues Govt.

From Herman Schulze-Berndt
Cologne Feb. 20

The German branch of the Church of Scientology has sued the West German Federal Government in the Cologne Administrative Court. Scientology wants the government to take back and cease making critical comments about the group.

Scientology is not the first cultic group to institute such proceedings. TM (Transcendental Meditation) sued the Federal Department of Youth, Family and Health Affairs in April, 1980.

German Scientology is demanding that the government retract — among other things — the following statements:

- Cult members lose their personalities and sense of reality through indoctrination.
- Power and money are the common aims of cults.
- There are parallels between destructive cult experiences, drug abuse, alcoholism, and terrorism.
- Cult members are forced to break connections with friends and relations.
- Cults practice illegal solicitation of funds.
- Public cult statements bely cult practices.
- Scientology justifies ruthless treatment of unreliable members and criticism of opponents by appeals to total freedom.

In other developments, Ingo Heinemann, a worker with Aktion Bildungs Information (Stuttgart), has claimed in a publication of that organization that the Center of Individual and Effective Learning (ZIEL) is a Scientology front. And in a lecture recently broadcast by Radio Vatican, Hans Löffelmann (Munich) Deputy of the Catholic Church in Bavaria, characterized Scientology as belonging to that group of cults offering technologies for "supermen."

PAULETTE COOPER vs. SCIENTOLOGY

Writer Sues Scientologists

Staff Report
Boston Mar. 15

New York writer Paulette Cooper, author of The Scandal of Scientology, filed a $15 million damage suit in Boston on Mar. 9 against the Church of Scientology of Boston, L. Ron Hubbard, Scientology founder, and his wife, Mary Sue.

Ms. Cooper charges the church with carrying out a smear campaign against her. She says members of a special church unit call the B1 Bureau infiltrated government and private agencies and burglarized the office of a Boston Globe lawyer and Ms. Cooper's doctor to gain information to discredit her.

In 1977 the FBI seized documents at a California Scientology office which had been stolen from federal agencies. The action resulted in the conviction of high-ranking Scientologists, including Mary Sue Hubbard, on criminal charges.

Pressing Ms. Cooper's suit is attorney Michael J. Flynn, of Boston, who also represents numerous former Scientologists in a $200 million class action suit against the church and its leaders.

Ms. Cooper claims that the B1 Bureau was set up by the Hubbards to conduct "covert and illegal operations against any organization or individual critical of the Hubbards or Scientology."

The documents seized by the FBI in 1977 included Scientology memoranda detailing the kinds of "dirty tricks" the organization used to intimidate and control both members and critics.

The church has in recent months acknowledged wrongdoing by some of its members but says this sort of activity was not church policy and is not continuing. Former members and critics deny that there has been a change.

Rev. Jack Brighton, public affairs director of the Boston church said the suit was "designed to foster publicity and camouflage Cooper's dishonesty. . . This case is only the latest in a series of harassive actions by Cooper against the church."

Wrong role for Scientologists

MAY 5 1981 STAR

Sectarian propaganda, however diluted and well-disguised, has no place in the classrooms of Ontario's public schools.

With that basic principle firmly in mind, Metro school boards should say, "Thanks, but no thanks," to members of the Church of Scientology who want to present a drug-education program to students starting in Grade 3.

According to a report by Ellie Tesher in The Saturday Star, Scientologists for Social Action are mounting an intensive campaign to introduce their Drug-Free Schools program of lectures and workshops into Metro's classrooms. They're seeking support from other Metro churches and from celebrities, especially popular music stars with an appeal to young people.

The ostensible object of the exercise — to teach young people from an early age about the dangers of drug abuse — is, of course, laudable. Few Ontario citizens, be they parents, teachers, social workers, policemen or clergymen, can fail to be concerned about the dangers of drug abuse among young people. Indeed, a 1979 survey of Ontario students by the Addiction Research Foundation showed an increased use of drugs such as marijuana, non-prescription stimulants and LSD. Alcohol abuse, too, is found to be a problem among some Ontario students.

So there's clearly a need for programs in the schools to teach young people about the hazards of drug abuse. But it is the school authorities, not the representatives of churches whose motives are mixed, who should do the educating.

The Toronto Board of Education, for example, starts factual education about drug use as early as Kindergarten; by Grade 4, pupils have been taught the dangers of marijuana use and glue-sniffing. Other schools, using their own resources, can surely do as well.

And if outside help is required in a particular school where there may be a particular problem, there's no need to call on the churches. There are independent experts — from the Addiction Research Foundation, from local public health departments, even from the police — who can be called on.

If the Church of Scientology or, indeed, any other church wants to get involved in drug education, let it do so on its own turf. Church-sponsored programs belong in parish halls, in the private homes of parishioners or even in public places where people have a free choice of whether or not to enrol. They do not belong among a captive audience in a public school classroom.

Shake-up of Scientology Agency Told

By JOHN DART,
Times Religion Writer

The Church of Scientology said Monday it has shaken up its controversial security and public affairs agency, declaring the Guardian Office "went adrift" by engaging in a fixed battle with the federal government.

The shake-up, primarily at the organization's U.S. headquarters in Los Angeles, involves resignations and demotions of 10 administrators, said the Rev. Doug Smith, Southern California director of public affairs for the Church of Scientology.

Smith said the changes signal a shift away from broad confrontation tactics with government agencies.

Smith confirmed that Mary Sue Hubbard, wife of Scientology founder L. Ron Hubbard, resigned her top church position as "controller" some time ago. She was replaced by the Rev. Gordon Cook, a South African who is working out of Los Angeles. Cook was unavailable for comment.

Second in Command

Mary Hubbard was one of 11 Scientologists convicted by a federal court in Washington nearly two years ago of charges stemming from a four-year church program to burglarize, bug and infiltrate various U.S. government agencies. All 11 are free on bail.

Also convicted was Jane Kember of Great Britain, former chief guardian and second in command to Mary Hubbard.

Kember was replaced by Geoffrey Miller of Great Britain, Smith said, but the post now carries less authority.

The guardian offices, once autonomous in overseeing Scientology's legal, financial, public affairs and security operations, has been placed under the authority of the newly created executive director international office, Smith confirmed.

The shift in Scientology policies reported by Smith was indicated in an internal church memorandum circulated by Bill Franks, who became the executive director in April.

The Guardian Office "went adrift," Franks wrote.

"An obvious example might be the criminal cases," he said.

Franks insisted that "any and all criminal actions were done by a handful of individuals; it was not by the church."

Scientology was founded as a church organization by Hubbard in 1954 after the one-time science-fiction writer outlined his ideas on mental health in a book called "Dianetics." The organization offers exercises and "spiritual" counseling aimed at eliminating negative thoughts.

Critics of Scientology's methods, which they say have included harassment of ex-Scientologists, have claimed that while the church publicly renounces such tactics, it continues to practice them. Scientology officials deny such charges.

Five of the Guardian Office administrators demoted here were among the 11 convicted in Washington, Smith said.

Cult Deception Examined

by Stephen Hyde

The following article first appeared in the Oct. 9 TOWERLIGHT of Towson (MD) State University, to whom we are grateful for permission to reprint it here.

"And if anyone says to you, 'Look, here is the Christ!' or prophets will arise and show signs and wonders, to lead astray, if possible, the elect."

— Mark 13:21-22

Quasi-religious cults use sophisticated thought reform techniques in recruitment; techniques that weaken a person's critical and analytical capabilities. Hypnosis is another recruitment tool in some cults, and public misunderstanding of the nature of hypnosis calls for a simple, concise definition: a state of highly increased suggestibility, often involving a more or less obvious trance state. Trance states can be induced by concentration, chanting or by uninterrupted interpersonal eye contact. Cults also use deceit for recruitment and fundraising; sometimes as misrepresentation, other times as distortion of an intentionally altered Biblical "quote."

Money is the heart of any cult's power. The financial empire of Sun Myung Moon, for example, has an estimated worth of several hundred million dollars, accumulated from many sources. Street sales of flowers, candy and literature have an outrageously high profit margin. Deceit often does a part here, as members sell candy or flowers, purportedly to raise money for the mentally retarded, drug abuse programs, starving children, or any other cause which will appeal to gullible people.

These "white lies" as they are called by the Moonies themselves, are part of the doctrinal practice of "heavenly deception." Page 72 of the Unification Church's 120-Day Training Manual reads, in part, "When green bills are in the hands of fallen men, can they (the bills) be happy? Why don't you make them happy? ... They (the dollars) are all destined to go to Father... Christians think the Messiah must be poor and miserable. He did not come for this. Messiah must be the richest." Moon is Father and Messiah to his cult followers.

The balance of revenue comes from companies owned by Moon which, out of necessity, have no obvious connection to him: FIRMS MANUFACTURING MUNITIONS, TITANIUM PRODUCTS, GINSENG TEA, PHARMACEUTICALS, ETC. Service companies like travel agencies, printing companies, carpet cleaning services (contracts have included FBI offices in Sacramento and McClellan Air Force Base) and others. A burgeoning fishing industry that spreads along the East Coast & Gulf from Massachusetts to Alabama.

Moon's church's tax-exempt status, and the fact that the church is not required to make financial disclosure statements to any governmental body in this country make for a convenient financial management plan. It is a shell game of moving money in either direction between the "non-profit" Unification Church and Moon's businesses. Money, money, who's got the money? Try to pick up the shell that the cash is underneath. The cult is quicker than the eye...

Earlier this year, one of Moon's companies (U.S. Foods Corp. of McLean, Va.) provided the funds to start a chain of convenience stores, similar to 7-11, but named Go 'N Joy, in the Seattle area. Moon intended to enter the store-front church game. When the Washington State Liquor Control Board received the Go 'N Joy liquor license application, the board asked for background information on Bo Hi Pak, the president of U.S. Foods. Pak is Moon's chief aide and translator. Rather than provide the information, Pak sold his controlling shares of the store chain to a more legitimate businessman, Henry Hurt of Towson, Md.

Hurt is a 72-year-old insurance man and a self-professed "life member" of the Unification Church. According to the Seattle Herald, Hurt paid one dollar per share, giving him administration of a 1-5 million dollar loan for $80 (he bought 80 shares). Hurt is now president and chairman of the board of Go 'N Joy. In a September 24 interview, he told me that he had no day-to-day control of the stores; that management was handled by U.S. Foods. He went on to say, "I bought the stock from U.S. Foods, and if they wanted me to sell it tomorrow, I'd sell it. So in that respect, I was a front for them in this business."

So who really owns the Go 'N Joy Stores? Simple: Moon, through Pak, through Hurt. Any profit from the stores (which are presently floundering because of picketing by anti-cult groups) will not go to the president and chairman of the board, but to Father.

Cult members constantly complain about negative coverage by the news media, yet in one instance, the medium of commercial television was taken advantage of by the Church of Scientology, an international cult founded by science fiction writer L. Ron Hubbard.

Several weeks ago NBC presented programming worth 5 million dollars of air time around the theme of "Get High On Yourself." The project was the brainchild of producer Robert Evans (doing probationary penance for a cocaine conviction), and Cathy Lee Crosby (Pepsodent-smile host of "That's Incredible" and a Scientologist). The idea, on the surface, was to keep kids off of drugs, to get them high on themselves. Criticism of that sentiment would be akin to slapping babies in the face, but there was more behind it all. Every celebrity/Scientologist (Crosby, John Travolta, Henry Winkler, et al.) was on the tube that week, along with other luminaries like Bob Hope and Paul Newman, all telling America to get high on itself.

NBC and a cast of superstars were used to create a positive association with the name of the "Theme Week." Crosby, the driving creative force, is associated with Narconon, an alleged anti-drug Scientology front group which has been trying to get a federal grant to take their campaign (and allegedly, Scientology) into federal prisons for the benefit of the inmates. Last week, when Scientology headquarters in California was contacted about a relative with an urgent drug problem, the caller was put through to an extension which was answered by a voice saying "Get high on yourself." That's incredible.

Surely this incident and the entire NBC campaign bears further exploring. As they say, you'll read it here first.

Here on the TSU campus, the Moonies, like Lone Strangers, ride again. CARP (Collegiate Association for the Research of Principles) is the college recruiting wing of the Unification Church. They have been repeatedly denied recognition by the TSU Student Government Association since 1976. This semester, CARP Moonies have represented themselves as members of "an international student group" in conducting "surveys on current social issues" with students at random. The surveys were a screening process, to determine the suitability of each student for membership in the Unification Church. Dominique Lavoie, head of the CARP chapter at TSU, has visited every student religious organization recognized by the SGA in an attempt to set up speeches to their members and/or "religious dialogues."

Like the rest of us, the members of CARP once had freedom of thought, but no longer; no matter how much they insist that they are not controlled absolutely by Moon. They believe that they can save the world by bringing each and every one of us into their movement. Every CARP member and every other Moonie has a nice wide smile, but then so does a bear trap when it's set correctly. Caveat emptor (let the buyer beware).

Scientology-Narconon Link Protested

The Toronto Globe and Mail of Oct. 13 reports that Alderman Susan Fish will demand her name be removed from the list of advisors to Narconon, a drug rehabilitation agency, because the organization was not candid with her about its link to the Church of Scientology, the controversial cultic organization.

Fish had been assured by a Narconon representative that the agency was not connected to any church or creed when she questioned references to the fact that Narconon used the techniques of L. Ron Hubbard, founder of Scientology, and that Hubbard had an interest in religions.

The Globe and Mail reports that "When Narconon started in Toronto its connection with Scientology was concealed and then played down when inquiries were made to staff members, all Scientologists." "But," the story goes on, "documents from the cult's files in Canada and the United States show otherwise...Narconon was on a cult list of groups it had set up as apparently independent corporations, but which were used to further the work of Scientology through public relations, recruiting or propaganda..."

The Narconon Sting:

SCIENTOLOGY'S MINNESOTA DRUG SCAM.

BY PAUL FISHMAN MACCABEE

"Narconon is the ONLY successful drug rehabilitation program on the planet."

L. Ron Hubbard,
Founder of Church of Scientology

"Narconon was definitely a con. It was bullshit. Those guys were forcing guys into Scientology."

Narconon graduate
St. Cloud Prison, Minnesota

AS WITH MOTHER NATURE AND THE I.R.S., it's not nice to fool around with Narconon. Mike Rezendez of Boston's Community News learned that in 1978, as a cool-headed reporter with a hot tip. He'd heard of a novel drug rehabilitation clinic called Narconon, which boasted a miraculous 85 percent cure rate for heroin addicts.

But Rezendez also heard that Narconon was hiding links to Scientology, a religious cult whose devotees include John Travolta and pianist Chick Corea. Intrigued, Rezendez scheduled a meeting with Narconon publicity officer Dan Barber.

There, according to Rezendez, the Narconon official warned the newsmen he was "a small fish in a big sea with a lot of f-cking sharks" and that he was dealing with "an interplanetary organization." Barber allegedly promised to come after Rezendez with "hob-nailed boots," and said "I will kick your ass up into your throat if I ever catch you f-cking around with Narconon."

Now, a surprise raid on Narconon-Minnesota's $30,000 drug program in the St. Cloud Reformatory has ignited shockwaves reaching from Narconon's California headquarters to their operations in Minneapolis, and from the Hollywood studios of NBC-TV to, incredibly, the office of U.S. Senator Rudy Buschwitz of Minnesota — who unwittingly provided Scientology with seed money for Narconon.

Confidential Scientology memos, released to TCR by former church members, suggest that for three years Narconon has deceived major Twin Cities foundations like General Mills and the McKnight Foundation, as well as the Minnesota Dept. of Corrections and dozens of Minneapolis businesses, into funding a covert recruiting arm for the Church of Scientology.

Narconon was founded in 1966 by ex-heroin addict William Benitez. Since then, Narconon surfaced in prisons from Vacaville in California to Meynard Prison in Missouri.

Narconon-Minnesota describes its program as a "purification rundown" process which involves vitamins, exercise and saunas to "sweat out impurities in the cells." But members readily admit Narconon's bedrock is the philosophy of L. Ron Hubbard, a former science-fiction writer who confessed: "Writing for a penny a word is ridiculous. If a man wanted to make a million dollars, the best way would be to start a religion."

Narconon, while adopting Hubbard's ideas, is completely separate from the Church.

Minnesota has been kind to Narconon. It profits from two locations — a 1427 Washington Ave., Mpls street clinic and a unit in the St. Cloud Reformatory for Men. From 1978-80, Narconon-St. Cloud received $6,200 of Minnesota state funds and over $55,500 in federal funding to support their drug rehabilitation and communication courses.

But Narconon's appealing menu is not entirely kosher.

Narconon claims to get referrals from local hospitals. Yet, curiously, Narconon seem to be an utter mystery to every major drug clinic in the Twin Cities.

Dr. George Mann, director of St. Mary's Hospital Chemical Dependency Unit in Minneapolis, has never heard of Narconon. Nor has Harry Swift, administrator of Hazeldon's Chemical Dependency section. Nor have the drug abuse units at St. Joseph's Hospital, St. John's, Abbott-Northwestern, Golden Valley Health Center or the Metropolitan Medical Clinic had contact with Narconon.

The mystery deepened when TCR contacted the Minnesota Chemical Dependency Association, which lists the state's 800 certified chemical dependency practitioners. Certification is based on 1,000 hours of experience and completion of a certified chemical dependency program. According to the Assn., virtually none of Narconon-St. Cloud's "counselors" nor the officials at Narconon-Minneapolis are certified.

William Gonnson, vice-president of Narconon, once the executive director of Narconon-St. Cloud and a former sheet-metal worker, is not listed.

Jon Reisdorf, once the Narconon teacher at St. Cloud and a former dry-cleaning manager, is not listed.

Rick Johnson of Minneapolis, a Narconon senior supervisor and a former draftsman, is not listed.

And what of the Narconon organization itself? The Chemical Dependency Programming Office of Minnesota licenses 76 outpatient clinics in Minnesota. Narconon is not among them.

In addition, the Minnesota Dept. of Welfare licenses 47 local outpatient chemical dependency programs. Surprise — Narconon isn't listed there either. Unless Narconon-Minnesota claims one of several exemptions (such as treating fewer than five addicts at one time), State Licensing Consultant Michael Clawson believes "they would have to get a license." Clawson remembers Narconon-Minnesota officials visiting his division in 1980. They didn't bother to apply, perhaps because licensing would require submission of detailed program descriptions.

"Either they're totally ignorant of custom and law," says Clawson of Narconon, "or they're trying to pull something."

If Narconon is not a licensed clinic, and its "counselors" remain unaccredited with the Chemical Dependency Assn., just who is Narconon?

One thing is certain — the Church of Scientology has more control of the Minnesota drug program than they wish to publicly admit.

Narconon-Minnesota's incorporation papers list their first corporate address as the Grand Ave., Mpls apartment of Narconon official Rick Johnson. According to a 1973 issue of the Scientology magazine, The Auditor, Johnson is a "Clear" (Church parlance for a Scientologist who has been "freed of his chronic mental and physical difficulties.")

Johnson's partner on the Narconon board was Lottie Seidler of Minneapolis, a former UPI reporter and admitted Scientologist.

Both Narconon-Minnesota vice-president William Gonnson and Narconon-St. Cloud teacher Jon Reisdorf are listed in the June And both Narconon treasurer Ken Turner and his wife, Narconon president Michele Scalzo, are dedicated Scientologists.

The reason for Narconon's hiding its Scientology links is explained in an astonishing series of internal Scientology memos released by Lorna Levett, for six years the director of a Canadian Scientology mission. A Nov. 23, 1971 letter from Narconon Director Mark Jones talks of "getting Narconon programs in prisons and working to get them in the armed forces. A little later we will start Narconon drug rehab centers in the local communities and route the people on Org or Center lines when we get them off drugs." Org means Scientology organization, and center is a Scientology mission.

Jones urges Scientologists to "emphasize that Narconon is not Scientology."

Levett also received a letter from Narconon supervisor Artie Maren, which claimed: "We are expanding the Scientology drug rehabilitation programs, primarily through Narconon. The local rehabilitation centers will bring drug users off drugs and on to the local Mission or Church lines for further training and spiritual counseling." The Church says the letter is a forgery. Levett says, in a sworn affidavit, it is authentic.

Scientology founder L. Ron Hubbard himself, in a August 29, 1972 letter, candidly explains that the Scientology "Guardian's Office has been running the Narconon program all over the world." According to Scientology files seized by the F.B.I. in 1977, it was the Guardian's Office — Hubbard's "dirty tricks" branch — which coordinated a national harassment campaign against critics of the church. That campaign, which included burglaries, forging of bomb threats, and eavesdropping on U.S. government offices, led to the conviction in 1978 of nine top Scientology officials.

The best example of Scientology's use of Narconon as a propaganda tool is a memo sent by Narconon official Nancy Batchelder. Titled "Narconon: A Vanguard for Scientology," the memo urges: "O.K. mock up a map of the U.S. (or look at one) and then one by one mock up a little Narconon symbol appearing in the center of each state representing full state support of Narconon. Did you do that? Good! How does that feel, to totally handle the drug problem in the U.S.?"

"Narconon has no competitors," Batchelder says. "In Narconon, we're sort of like pioneers and scouts clearing the way for Scientology tech in the wildest, darkest wilderness, prisons, criminals, drug addicts... the ruins of society. The success of this program will mean a tremendous amount for the rapid expansion of Scientology tech in the world."

In Minnesota, Narconon's obsession with Scientology's "rapid expansion" in the St. Cloud prison, rather than drug rehabilitation, quickly bubbled to the surface.

In an Oct. 22, 1979 report, St. Cloud official Cliff Posthumus noted "a serious incident this quarter regarding Narconon staff getting into side conversations about Scientology." Internal prison memos indicate a Narconon student was removed from the program when "he became steadily more depressed and confused" over Scientology teachings. A case-worker wrote that the inmate "was not deriving any benefit from the program and in fact I believe he was regressing in his ability to think clearly and in his self-image."

Dr. Patrick Stokes, a St. Paul psychiatrist, confirmed in a memo Narconon's "excessive harassment which has been verified by his caseworker in the Narconon program, regarding religious matters and push towards cult-like Scientology customs." Nor was this an isolated case — a memo to St. Cloud's superintendent says that the chaplain discovered "Narconon students in his bible study class have mentioned similar complaints regarding discussions about reincarnation and Scientology."

Martin Carr [his name has been changed here] is a St. Cloud inmate who graduated from all seven Narconon courses. "Narconon is definitely a con," says Carr. "It's a bunch of bullshit. No way it would keep inmates off drugs. They were hiding from the staff and the institution that they were having people read Scientology books."

Carr says Narconon members obscured the word 'Scientology' in prison texts with white-out fluid, and then typed the word 'Narconon' over it.

While Narconon's Lottie Seidler says the group actually "discourages inmates from joining Scientology," Carr insists they "tell inmates they've got programs when you get out. And they'd mention Scientology freely."

"If I yelled that those guys were forcing people into Scientology, an investigation would have gotten started," says Carr. But for many inmates, Narconon was part of a Mutual Agreement Programming contract with the prison. Leaving Narconon on had terms could add months to their sentence.

Finally in mid-August, St. Cloud officials raided the Narconon office and found, say prison sources, "more than they wanted to know about Scientology literature." An investigation began on Aug. 28, 1981, and by Aug. 31 at 1:30 p.m., a prison meeting was held to deal with Narconon's links to Scientology. St. Cloud officials had had enough. Two weeks ago, Narconon-Minnesota's contract with the Minnesota Dept. of Corrections was terminated and the program kicked out of the prison on 30-days notice.

Narconon's defeat in St. Cloud will come as a shock to over 42 Minneapolis/St. Paul businesses who donated funds for the program. Did the Narconon fundraisers mention their ties to Scientology? "If they had," says the manager of Deakne Hardware, "I wouldn't have agreed to contribute."

The owner of Ideal Sandwich shop says, "There was no mention of Scientology. I had the impression that Narconon was similar to Alcoholics Anonymous." And the manager of Campus Travel in Minneapolis seethes. "No mention was made of Scientology. Hey, I'm against things like the Moonies and mind-control. I didn't know Narconon had anything to do with religion."

But Campus Travel was small fish compared to the General Mills Foundation, which awarded Narconon a $1,500 grant for St. Cloud. The Foundation was never told about Scientology. Nor was the Curt Carlson Foundation ($200) or the American Lutheran Church Women ($2,500).

But Narconon's biggest score was the plywood tycoon who contributed their seed money. That donor was U.S. Sen. Rudy Boschwitz of Minnesota.

Boschwitz's Senate office confirms he donated $200 for Narconon in 1976, with an additional $940 over the next two years. Narconon fund-raiser Lottie Seidler remembers Boschwitz's generosity. "Rudy Boschwitz was my first cash contribution. He sent the check with a note, 'Here's my contribution for Narconon. And here's a list of people you might ask for contributions. You can say I suggested it. If there's anyone on the list you don't have the courage to call,' he wrote, 'call me and I'll ask them for you.'"

Boschwitz, reached at his Washington office, insists that Narconon never told him of their link to Scientology. "It would have affected my decision, yes."

Said Boschwitz legislative aide Tom Mason, "Who was aware of Scientology in 1976? You're not going to get Rudy to back Scientology." Mason notes the Narconon donations were a very small part of Boschwitz's estimated $56,000 gifts to charity in 1976.

Of course, Sen. Boschwitz has the right to support any charity he pleases, whether it be Muscular Dystrophy or the Sacred Cult of the Divine Grape. But the impact of Boschwitz' donation was far out of proportion to its size.

Narconon mentioned Sen. Boschwitz's donations in their grant requests to both the McKnight Foundation and H. B. Fuller of Minneapolis. Neither company was told of Narconon's link to Scientology. McKnight gave $3,000. H. B. Fuller gave $2,500.

Most frighteningly, Boschwitz's donation may have protected the St. Cloud program from criticism. Says one prison official, "the staff of St. Cloud thought they might have potential trouble if they kicked Narconon out of their institution, because they thought Rudy Boschwitz supported it."

As a result, an unaccredited drug program featuring unaccredited dependency counselors operated at St. Cloud prison long after its ties to Scientology surfaced.

Narconon's effectiveness in St. Cloud is difficult to determine. Astonishingly, no records were kept on the use of drugs by Narconon students. And Crime Control Board reports show Narconon-St. Cloud attendance often falling "far below" the contracted goals of the program.

But in Michigan, where Corrections Dept. psychologist John Hand called Narconon "so misleading as to be termed a 'con,'" a 1980 prison study concluded "graduates of the Narconon program do not do as well as our population in general."

Palo Alto, California's 1977 evaluation of Narconon pointed out the program's staff had failed to accompany addicts to hospitals as required, did not collect urinalysis when required by contract, never submitted follow-up reports, "did not provide access to client files," and did not "establish any sort of working relationship" with other drug abuse clinics. The Report said other drug counselors had "serious doubts about the competency of Narconon Palo Alto."

Still, Narconon Palo Alto charged fees called "probably prohibitive," averaging $50/hour for the 75,125 hours spent on the "purification rundown." Fees reached as high as $1,495 per addict. Other agencies didn't refer clients to Narconon due to the "relationship between NPA and the Church of Scientology." Citing a "low level of performance," the city terminated Narconon in 1977.

Narconon literature calls their Purification Rundown process, available in Minnesota for approximately $1,102, "like a cleansing flow of pure spring water." But an evaluation of Narconon's L.A. program conducted by Dr. Forest Tennant, PhD, for the California Dept. of Health found otherwise.

Dr. Tennant charged that Narconon's detoxification procedures "are without proper medical supervision and may be dangerous." He called claims for an 86 percent cure rate "misleading" and "simply not true."

Former Narconon students say the rundown involves massive doses of niacin - often as much as 2,000 to 5,000 milligrams per day. Health agencies note the recommended daily allowance of niacin is 17 to 21 milligrams. Dr. Tennant told the Health Dept. that Narconon's megavitamin detoxification of addicts "may be hazardous and, in some cases, lethal."

Yet Narconon's plans for growth in the Twin Cities continue. A recent Narconon-Minnesota newsletter notes "the school year is about to begin again. If you are a parent that would like to see a drug education lecture given, perhaps this is something you would like to bring up at a PTA meeting." The newsletter says Narconon presented a project for Idaho high-school students. "The probable result will be that Narconon will then be put into the whole public school system at Idaho. Let's try to make Minnesota the next state to do this."

The loss of Narconon's showplace in St. Cloud, and the federal and state funds that went with it, has wounded Scientology and its hopes for a "drug program." But while Narconon may have lost the battle in Minnesota, they're winning the war in Hollywood.

Last month, NBC-TV devoted $5 million worth of network airtime for the anti-drug campaign, "Get High On Yourself." Filmed by producer Robert Evans, the Campaign featured celebrities like Henry Winkler and Cheryl Tiegs.

But there are disturbing hints that the "Get High" campaign is being exploited - some say controlled - by Scientology for its own ends.

The chairwoman of "Get High" is actress Cathy Lee Crosby, described as the hostess of TV's "That's Incredible." But the Sept. 1979 issue of Scientology's Auditor magazine lists Crosby as a Scientology "Clear." Last year, Crosby testified before the U.S. Sen. Committee on Narcotics Abuse to extol the virtues of a "purification program" she had taken, called Narconon. "I did the program myself and it was so fantastic, I wanted to get it out into the world," says Crosby.

Press queries to NBC-TV are referred to Crosby's agent Kathie Wasserman, described as the executive director of the Get High On Yourself Foundation. But Wasserman has other responsibilities. The June 1977 issue of the Auditor lists her as a Scientology student in Los Angeles' Celebrity Center. Scientology critics fear that the estimated $6 million raised by "Get High" may be nourishing Scientology's power rather than drug programs.

The tragedy of Narconon and "Get High" is that, in the words of Dr. Forest Tennant, "public money is being used for purposes other than drug rehabilitation" while vital medical care for drug abusers "may be gravely delayed or omitted." □

NBC - GET HIGH ON YOURSELF

NBC says they were unaware of any connection between Get High on Yourself and Scientology. Rona Barrett on the Today Show commented on the connection and quoted a statement made by Paulette Cooper. That evening NBC "handled it" on That's Entertainment. They, NBC, would never knowingly have given free time to publicize and promote any political, philosophical or religious group. See related article Narconon Sting.

READERS DIGEST ARTICLE RESPONSE

The Readers Digest article Sept. 1981, Scientology: The Sickness Spreads has generated about 400 inquiries. Many who write or call are wives of Scientologists. They say their husbands have given money, saved for specific needs, to Scientology for training. The fanatical desire to continue Scientology courses and the alienation, if the partner disapproves, is destroying many marriages.

London Student (12 Nov. 81) expresses concern regarding Scientology's 'Free personality tests'. We reported in our October newsletter on these questionnaires being handed out in Tonbridge. The paper quotes this statement by a Professor of Psychology: 'Any inferences based on the Scientology questionnaire are open to grave doubts. The use of such tests is positively dangerous in the wrong hands.' London Student sent ten volunteers for a free personality test. All were told that their personalities needed 'urgent attention' and were urged to allow the 'church' to direct their treatment. Failing this, they were advised to buy one of the many books by Ron Hubbard.

... security chief

His job not always so 'secure'

David Post has a job that keeps him running and dodging and ducking and, sometimes, hopping mad. Post is security chief at the Church of Scientology's Fort Harrison Hotel headquarters, where just about once a week a heckler, vandal or robber creates a hassle for security guards.

"I'm not saying everyone should agree with Scientology, but you don't break the law to prove a point," says the 19-year-old, who joined the church with his mother in Washington, D.C., five years ago. "I wish people would just talk to us instead of causing trouble."

In his three years on the job in Clearwater, Post has been the target of eggs, bottles and cans; he's been punched and shot at (fortunately, the assailant used a blank gun); and he's chased down suspects "many times." Post says he has assisted police in several prosecutions, including one in which a man was ordered to spend a night with Post "to see the other side."

Post, a high school graduate, heads a team of eight full-time guards and 30 reservists—all Scientologists—who rotate shifts at the church's seven Clearwater properties. He earns $30 a week, but the church pays for his housing, food, medical bills and Scientology courses.

His outside interests include tap dancing and stand-up comedy, and he believes Scientology will help him in a career in entertainment.

PRISCILLA PRESLEY A SCIENTOLOGIST

Milt Wolf, a spokesman for the Church of Scientology in Clearwater, Florida, confirmed in early December that Priscilla Presley is a Scientologist.

Craig Robertson, writing in the Dec. 2 St. Petersburg Times, reports that Ms. Presley, widow of Elvis Presley, has visited the Church's Clearwater headquarters on one or two occasions in recent months.

The Scientology statement appears to have been in response to a story by freelance writer Jim McLandish, one of a team of reporters who wrote a feature on Scientology which first appeared in the Oct. 28 issue of the National Enquirer.

The church has severely criticized a statement in the Enquirer story that Ms. Presley has "plunged" her daughter "into the clutches of a mind-bending religious cult, hellbent on using her to get their hands on her father's millions."

The church confirmed, says Robertson, that 12 year old Lisa Presley is a student at a California School which relies on techniques developed by Scientology founder L. Ron Hubbard.

Writer McLandish told the Times Robertson that Clearwater City Commissioner Richard Tenny and local church critic Alex Cornell, were helpful in providing background for the Enquirer story and tips on Ms. Presley's connection with the church.

NARCONON Anti-drug program with roots in Scientology doesn't live up to claims of support, success

A booklet published by Narconon and submitted to Florida authorities makes several claims that are untrue. Narconon officials don't deny that the booklet contains inaccurate and outdated material, but say it was not intended to mislead officials, who granted Narconon a license to conduct anti-drug educational lectures.

CLEARWATER — Narconon, an anti-drug program based on tenets of the Church of Scientology and now setting up shops in Clearwater, isn't all it claims to be. It claims high success rates in rehabilitating drug users and wide acceptance by government agencies around the world.

But a St. Petersburg Times investigation has turned up evidence to the contrary. For example:

- ✓ A Michigan prison psychologist charged that Narconon is a "con" to gain money and recruits for the Church of Scientology. A former Narconon consultant with the church agrees.
- ✓ A California report done for that state's Department of Health said Narconon's use of megavitamins to detoxify addicts is a "hazardous" and "in some cases lethal" practice.

- ✓ In Delaware, Connecticut and Minnesota, Narconon prison programs were terminated after questions were raised about the program's effectiveness and its ties to the Church of Scientology.

- ✓ A 63-page promotional booklet published by Narconon and submitted to the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services (HRS) makes several claims that are untrue.

Despite these findings, Narconon still claims to be an effective anti-drug program that, one Narconon official wrote, "has literally saved the lives of countless addicts and drug users around the world, restoring them to their families and communities."

The 63-page Narconon booklet, submitted to HRS in support of Narconon's application for a local operating license, makes a variety of claims, among them:

- ✓ That Narconon still has a prison program in Connecticut. In fact, the program was terminated five years ago.
- ✓ That Narconon has a treatment program at a juvenile detention facility in Colorado. In fact, Narconon pulled out of the facility more than a year ago.

- ✓ That Narconon runs a successful government-financed drug treatment program in West Berlin. In fact, the Berlin government severed its contract with Narconon two years ago.

- ✓ That officials of a youth training school in California issued a glowing evaluation of Narconon. In fact, the evaluation was done by Narconon's own staff.

The Narconon booklet also contains several written endorsements on stationery bearing the letterheads of various government agencies. In at least three cases, the endorsements were made by minor officials without authorization of the departments involved.

Narconon officials don't deny that the booklet contains inaccurate and outdated material.

"Granted, there are out-points (mistakes) in the book," said Gary Smith, Narconon's national director in Los Angeles. "But there are out-points in every program."

Smith said the publication, copyrighted by Scientology founder L. Ron Hubbard in 1979, is a "promotional piece" that is no longer used on the Pacific Coast.

He said the booklet was not intended to mislead Florida officials, who granted Narconon a license to conduct anti-drug educational lectures last May.

THESE OFFICIALS said the promotional booklet had no bearing on their approval of Narconon's license.

Charles Britt, district administrator of the Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services, said the book was submitted voluntarily and was considered irrelevant to Narconon's license application.

"It was not required as a condition precedent to licensure," said Florida HRS attorney Barbara McPherson.

'Climate' hinders Narconon here, spokesman says

By CRAIG ROBERTSON
St. Petersburg Times Staff Writer

CLEARWATER — Tampa Bay Narconon was formed last spring with the stated goal of delivering lectures on drug abuse to schools, community groups and professional drug counselors.

Since then, the group has changed executive directors three times and, spokesman Mike Fine says, has met with little success in finding forums for the lectures.

Fine says that the "climate" in Clearwater with regard to Scientology-related activities has hindered his efforts to spread information on the Narconon approach to drug abuse.

HE BLAMES negative media reports about the Church of Scientology.

But Fine says he is doing his best to "provide the true data about drugs" in the community.

For example, Fine recently tried to convince Charles Felton, director of the Pinellas County jails, to let Narconon give anti-drug lectures to inmates and officers at the maximum security center near Largo.

Felton said he turned down the offer, citing reports questioning the effectiveness of the Narconon program in other states.

Fine said he has also met with representatives of anti-drug groups around the state and hopes to start an anti-drug group for parents in Clearwater.

TAMPA BAY Narconon has established a "training center" at a house at 300 S Saturn Ave. in Clearwater and said in a recent press release that it plans to open similar centers in St. Petersburg and Tampa.

The press release said "a whole range of courses on recognizing, preventing and handling drug abuse" will be available at the Clearwater center.

Gary Lerner, new director of Tampa Bay Narconon, acknowledged that Narconon has made mistakes in the past, but said all large organizations have made mistakes.

"Just remember," Lerner said, "all we are trying to do is help kids, to get them off drugs."

LERNER SAID he does not know why his two predecessors left Tampa Bay Narconon.

Tampa Bay Narconon is not incorporated in Florida, although its local license application said incorporation procedures were in progress.

Through church spokesman Laura Wolfe, Fine said that, as far as he knows, the group does not plan to pursue incorporation.

Defender

'It's just a basic technology whereby a person can get off drugs, back into life and be happy. We don't push it (Scientology) on anybody. We never have.'

— Gary Smith, Narconon's national director, who branded Hand's assertion that money in Michigan was "laundered" as "ridiculous."

Critic

'They are phony, a front for the Church of Scientology. We found out in Michigan that most of the money that we were paying Narconon was laundered back into the Church of Scientology.'

— John Hand, Michigan prison psychologist.
